THE El FELIX

The moon ran yellow across the sky. The shadows on the wall looked like a railroad. In the corner, a man in a cowboy hat held his guitar gently on his lap. A dark-haired woman in a red bandana, remaining quiet behind a great mass of nachos, was the only other person there. She directed her attention to the man and tried to smile. The man nodded his head, closed his eyes, brushed his fingers over the strings, and sang:

From the snow capped mountains to the coral shores, you're the only one my heart adores.
You've only got three competitors: tacos, enchiladas, and beans.
Tacos, enchiladas, and beans — I consume them by the score.
And when I'm through, what do I do? I stamp and holler for more.
You can have the fourth position on my list. I must admit your kisses would be missed.
But how in the world could I exist without tacos, enchiladas, and beans.
